Stimulus-funded improvements are under way at Luke Air Force Base, and Arizona small businesses received the bulk of contracted work.

The American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 designated $15.3 million for infrastructure improvements at the Glendale military operation. Most of the work involves patching cracked runways and making air conditioning systems more energy-efficient.

When choosing companies to complete the repairs, members of the base's contracting unit kept in mind a Department of Defense goal to "maximize small-business participation," according to the agency's Recovery Act plan.

"The focus was on awarding local contractors as much as possible," said Lt. Col. John Thomas, the base's chief civil engineer.

Luke awarded around $12 million worth of contracts to four Phoenix-area firms that are classified by the federal Small Business Administration as disadvantaged or minority-, woman- or disabled person-owned small businesses.

Base staff had $15.3 million to spend on 28 projects but chose low contract bids and came in more than $2 million under budget.

Thomas said the savings likely mean that the base will be awarded an additional $1.7 million by November to complete three more projects. He added that small businesses would likely be given preference for those additional contracts.

Despite Luke's effort, August data released by the SBA shows the federal government fell short of its goal to award 23 percent of its contracts to small businesses in fiscal 2008. Federal agencies came in at 21.5 percent instead.

The four small businesses that won the bulk of Luke's Recovery Act contracts are:
